The Harper's Ferry Insurrectionists. One of the men who accompanied John Brown to Harper's Ferry, says the Providence (R. I.) Herald, had a sister in Maine, who was working for seventyfive cents a week to support her aged father and mother. but who was willing to spare something to bring her wandering brother home. The fellow was too busy in his work of philanthropy to heed her appeals, and now much better. The Pawtucket Gazette says: "A gentleman of Worcester, Mass., who went to North Elba, for the purpose of accompanying Mrs. Brown to Virginia to receive the remains of her husband, gave an account of his journey after his return to Worcester .-We are informed that he found the family miserably poor-in want of the common necessaries of life, in fact -and that clothing had to be procured for Mrs. Brown before she could start on her journey. A sympathizer with Brown who heard the narrative, came away with the conviction that however strong might have been his sympathy for the "colored man," he could have cared little for his own white wife and children. Cook's philanthropy was rather more of the practical sort. If he did not look out for his wife, he certainly had an eye to the interests of some of her relatives. P re is an extract from a Charlestown letter to the New York Herald which throws some light upon his character:

"I have just learned an incident of Cook, which betrays the great philanthropy of his magnanimous heart for the slave. This I get from a gentleman who is perteetly cognizant of the fact. It is, that a few days previous to the Harper's Ferry affair, Cook was engaged in shooting at a target at Knoxville, four miles from the Ferry, with several boys. "After he had done, he called on a Mrs. Hughes, an aunt of his wife, and strongly advised her to sell a slave man, stating that there might 'something turn up to render him valueless;' that if she would consent to sell him, he knew a gentleman who would buy the man and give her $1000 for him. This was a strong point against Cook, and clearly proved his utter recklessness and weakness of character, and his real disposition. If such was a sample of his philanthropy and love of the slave, it is to be rejoiced at, that such a hypocrite has

The Cotton Crop. Of all people in the world, the slaveholders of the South have been in their business and their pecuniary profits the most successful. Nothing like the magnitude of their large and continually increasing gains is known in the history of commerce and agriculture. The out-turn of the cotton crop the present year will be enormous, and that, too, after having had last year the largest B. R. HOOD respectfully informs the public crop ever before known. Next week we shall have another heavy receipt, probably over 200,000 bales, and it seems now pretty certain that when we receive the accounts from the South up to 31st December, the receipts into the ports will show a total of 2,300,000 bales, or 500,000 more than to same period last year, an amount unprecedented in the history of the cotton trade.
